

Indiano & Williams tries medical malpractice case in Federal Court

In March, 2018, Indiano & Williams tried a 2-week medical malpractice case in Federal Court. The victim of this medical malpractice claim was a 65-year old man whose post-operative care led to his death. After an uneventful abdominal surgery to liberate a bowel obstruction, the patient suffered a hypoxic event that left him brain damaged initially. About ten days later, the patient died at the hospital due to issues related to a tracheostomy and the loss of his airway.

His three adult children were the plaintiffs. The case involved a large hospital and several doctors. The defense attorneys vigorously defended the interests of their respective clients as the trial team at Indiano & Williams pursued these claims with equal fervor.

After a well-presented case by all parties, a settlement was reached on the afternoon before closing arguments. The terms are confidential. The firms wishes to recognize both Vanesa Vicens and Ileana Cardona for the excellent professional work they did on this case to help this family who lost their father as a result of this medical malpractice.
